Think about a time when you helped someone. Write a personal narrative telling all about what happened when you helped someone. Be sure to use details that tell what you saw, heard, and felt.

When was the last time you helped someone? I helped my mother clean out the attic. I helped my uncle load firewood into the basement. Helping doesn’t have to be a big deal. You can help cook dinner or just clean up your room once in a while. Helping out in little ways can be deeply meaningful.

Once you get hooked on helping, you’ll want to try something bigger. You can develop leadership skills by planning a project to help people. You could plan for your school choir to sing at nursing homes. This helps people by cheering them up. You could arrange a cleanup day for picking up trash along the roadside. It is also a wonderful thing to raise money for important causes. You could raise money for a family whose house has burned down. I cannot tell you all of the ideas in this paper. You had better do something to help others.

It would be a very sad thing if people forgot to help one another. Think of all the times that someone has helped you. Your friends, your family, and even your teacher have helped you sometimes. You can show your appreciation by helping others yourself. Don’t wait. Do it now.

Here is something important. Helping others will make you feel great. You will like it. You might even decide that you will have a career that involves helping others. Nurses, teachers, and firefighters help others. You might want to think about these ideas.
